Adcote is a unique and vibrant girl's school located in a beautiful rural setting in Shrewsbury.

Adcote was originally a country house and boasts 30 acres of beautifully landscaped parkland surrounding the school. Enthusiastic and dedicated teaching professionals are the essence of Adcote's success and small class sizes make individual attention a reality. Adcote offers a variety and breadth of education – all pupils benefit from excellent tuition in a range of activities including tennis, horse riding, gymnastics and swimming. British values are at the forefront of the school's ethos and as a school community, the country's diverse heritage is celebrated. Adcote School is the only female school in Shropshire, UK and is a member of the British Girl's School Association.

The school was founded in 1907 and at present there are around 250 students. As a unique and vibrant traditional private school for girls, Adcote has a long history of remarkable achievements. It has an enviable reputation in the academic field and in the development of contemporary women. The school has always been ranked among the top female schools in the UK with excellent academic performance. Every year a large number of graduates successfully move to top universities such as Oxford and Cambridge and they maintain a 100% enrolment rate. The report of the British Private School Inspectorate Committee commented: "Adcote's students have excellent verbal skills and are very polite. Their behaviour is extraordinary. They respect each other and they respect different cultures. They are full of self-esteem and self-confidence."
